

WASTING WATER.

The editor of the Salt Lake Tribune always says the right things upon every situation which arises. The following concerning the present floods on the Mississippi and its tributaries, fully illustrates our meaning:

Millions of acres of land and scores of cities are flooded; and the prospect is that for days to come there will be more and more water and greater damage. In ancient Assyria, long centuries ago, the people were liable to just such afflictions as are now being suffered in Louisiana and Arkansas, and though the steam engine had not been discovered then; though no explosives were known; though labor-saving machinery had never been heard of; the people were a clear-headed, plucky race, and they cut a mighty canal across their country to serve as a vent for the boisterous river in the Spring time, to supply water for irrigation later; to make a water highway on which to carry their products, and by such means, and by the added amounts they were able to make the soil yield, they were finally enabled to support a population more dense than can now be found in any country of Europe. The barbarian swept down upon them, the decay which lies in tyranny, and the vices of civilization all working their courses at last sapped the energy of the people, and the race practically, under the erosion of the centuries, disappeared, the sources of the canals were filled up, and the desert encroaching more and more, at last converted the mighty region into a waste. But remains of the great canal with lateral branches still remains as evidences that in the forgotten past a master mind existed, a mind that had grasp enough to comprehend what was needed and power enough to execute the work.

Probably for ages before the work was begun the people annually suffered from floods, and on the bench lands back from the streams lost their crops through drouths, until a hard necessity drove them to the work in self-defense. Probably for another century the men of the States along our grandest river will suffer as they have for a century past from its fury, but by and by they will go to work and make the great river, which is so cruel now, a means of doubling their crops, a servant and not a master. When the mercies and blessings that slumber in the skillful handling of the waters for irrigation shall be known, our great rivers will no longer be permitted to carry their treasures steadily out to sea; a bridle will be put upon them; they will be lead into new paths. They will become what they were meant from the first to be—the very greatest blessing, next to earth and air, ever vouchsafed to men.

A Russian scientist bought four infant children from poor parents and confined them in separate rooms. They were taught absolutely nothing and were waited upon by a deaf and dumb attendant. They were plentifully supplied with good food and the rooms were large and well warmed and ventilated, but the infants were allowed no clothing and as such grew up. He was arrested for cruelty to children, but was released. He wants to find what are the instincts natural to the human animal.

How to Kiss.—If you are tall and she is short you must stand erect, draw her head close to your side, bend your head somewhat, near her forehead, place her right hand on your shoulder, then your left around her waist. By this time her left hand will be snugly imprisoned in your right hand. She will raise her face to look up at you. Draw your arm for a moment from around her waist, and gently tip her head backward and to the side, then—well that is the way.—Ex.
